Investment report

The net asset value at 31 July 2012 was 192.41p, an appreciation of 0.3% over the month. The FTSE All-Share rose by 1.3% on a total return basis.

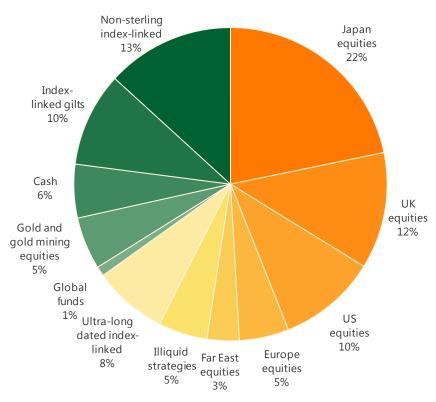

For those of even the slightest sporting bent July 2012 was packed full of excitement. The London Olympics are underway, and so far seem to be going swimmingly, largely thanks to tourists and the locals politely making way for the event by leaving town. Over the Channel Bradley Wiggins achieved what seemed an impossible dream - a British winner of the Tour de France for the first time in its history, then insouciantly hopped back across La Manche to pick up an Olympic gold medal little more than a week later. However, in financial markets it was a case of more of the same. Investors fretted about the eurozone, much as they have for the last two years, worried about the weakness of global growth and scanned the horizon anxiously for signs of the central bank cavalry riding once again to the rescue.

Alas, no such cavalry charge came in July, but there were as ever tantalising hints and signs. Mario Draghi raised hopes that imminent action from the ECB was on the cards, saying towards the end of the month that he would do whatever it takes to save the euro, albeit still within the scope of the ECB's mandate. This cheered investors, nudging global equities into the black for July, and seemed to have achieved the noble aim of buying time for eurozone bureaucrats to have a peaceful summer holiday on the beaches, until a lacklustre ECB meeting a few days later failed to deliver anything much at all. Meanwhile, nearer to home the Bank of England rejoined the expansionary tack early in the month by voting for a further £50bn of asset purchases, whilst in the US there were soothing words from Ben Bernanke about continued rock-bottom interest rates but no immediate new measures. So it seems that investors will have vet another fretful summer, on the one hand nervous about the lack of growth that is the inevitable consequence of the continuing debt burden, whilst at the same time hopeful that the cavalry really will arrive sometime soon, and all the time desperate not to miss out on any gains, however fleeting, that such actions might bring with them.

In view of the growing likelihood of further worldwide central bank balance sheet expansion, we have raised the gold exposure in the fund, albeit just after the month end. Gold, and in particular gold mining shares, have been acutely disappointing investments recently; the metal has been caught in the crosshairs of generally falling metal prices, and gold miners, especially the large stocks, continue to grapple, not always successfully, with issues of overshooting costs and undershooting production. So what has changed now? Firstly, coordinated action by central banks could undermine confidence in all the major currencies, and secondly, these extraordinary times are producing a new phenomenon, negative nominal interest rates. It has always been quite rightly held against gold that it does not produce an income, but neither these days does lending money to the governments of Switzerland, Denmark and Germany. In a world where the economic textbook is being constantly reinvented, negative real interest rates are already morphing into negative nominal rates; under these circumstances the opportunity cost of holding gold rapidly diminishes.

Elsewhere there has been little change in our portfolio. We have timidly sought to take some small advantage of the eurozone malaise by taking a position in Ebro Foods, a global rice and pasta business whose only sin is to be listed in Madrid. Further afield, we have moved back into M1, the Singapore telecoms company which in addition to being reassuringly dull in a strong currency has quietly returned almost half its market capitalisation to shareholders over the last five years through dividends, and currently yields close to 6%. Such additions are small beer, but may help, along with gold, to deliver a reasonable positive return from a portfolio that, so far this year, has been rather better at preserving capital in market swoons than showing outright gains.
